

Event: Round Table Discussion

Organized by: Department of Political Science

Date: October 10, 2019

Number of Participants: Department faculty and students attended the event

The Department of Political Science organized a round table discussion on theme of adopting varied teaching methodologies for the successful achievement of course and program outcomes on October 10, 2019. Considering the number and nature of papers political science department is being handling, requirements of more versatile methods in teaching was felt essential to not only make course interesting but to also deliver the objectives with which they have been created. Thereby, faculty discussed on how more variation can be introduced by involving appropriate usage of quiz, research reports, surveys, presentations, viva, lectures, discussion, group projects, individual projects, etc. Since, each paper required different approach, therefore, a unique vision and method was focused as essentiality. Besides this, department discussed till now what progress they have achieved using above mention methods so that appropriate and needful changes can be adopted. The department also discussed how as per the uniqueness of each student different method is working and how they have been employing techniques to bring all of them at one single platform. So, that not just fast learner but also slow learners can also keep pace with the syllabus. Further, measures for improving the students performance in assessments was discussed.
